There were two battallons of troops at the point attacked, and we doubled them up and poured in a fire that killed over 169 and wounded nearly 290 more. The Spaniards broke and fied, a few of them taking refuge in a small fort. We used our field pieces and dynamite against the fort and soon demolished it. The amazons fought like the furies. Nearly every one of them had suffered grievous wrongs from the Spaniards and they took the opportunity for revenge. They rushed on the wounded Spaniards, backing them with machetes. Maceo tried to stop the slaughter, but the women were aroused thoroughly and would not obey commands. Finally Maceo had to threater to shoot the women unless they stopped hacking the Spaniards. One woman whose daughter had been taken by a Spanish officer, would bring her machete down on a wounded soldier, and servam.

As soon as the rainy season is well advanced it is believed that Maceo will make a general assault on Weyler's line.

Maceo thinks the yellow fever will declinate the troops stationed on the trocha, so as to render it easy to carry the lines.

BIG APPETITES

Are Often the Forerunners of Mental Decay.

Is the growth of the national appetite—at least of that part of the nation engaged in sedentary occupations—an indication of national mental and physical degeneration? The medical world says it is.

Does the subject seem barren of suggestion? Here is what Dr. Cyrus Edson has to say about it:

"The large appetites of men in business not requiring exercise, is caused by whipping' their stomachs to satisfy fancy. They are tempted by all sorts of dainties, such as the modern chef producers, and by the skill of the of her competitors. The match was beautiful and proposed as the state of the skill of the of her competitors.
